Russia and the West are stuck. Experts and officials from each side are talking past each other. During the quarter century since the end of the Cold War, the paradigm prevailing in the West was of a robust, largely unchallenged, and gradually expanding Western-led order, in which a reformed Russia could potentially find a place. Discordant Russian views were often discounted or ignored. Today, as Russia challenges that order, this post-Cold War framework has become a paradigm lost. How might Europe's security architecture evolve? Will Russia continue as a spoiler, or could it be a stakeholder?
